Before

Notes

Person 1
-he started looking for sub-categories first
-next, without organising them, put the cards down that he thought were sub categories at the top
-started organising them as headings at the top of the page that he thought was a correct order
-started grouping the remaining cards underneath these headings
-assumed everything with "Bart" on it went together because he didn't know what it was
-categorized the cards into drop-down menus
-feels like it's organised how the website would look. Middle of the page would be the news, and the rest of the cards to the left and right of the middle based on what categories he thinks they go in (Ticket stuff goes with the category tickets, etc)
-sorted the cards based on how he would think the website would look was his summary

Person 2
-put search at the very top
-says it's way too crowded (too many cards)
-started spreading cards apart for clarity
-FAQ to bottom because he said it's not important
-put news in the middle since he said it's important and you want to keep people informed
-schedules and departures at the top because he said it's important since that's the whole point of the website
-group departure/arrival with schedule because he thinks they would be together
-says search would be in a toolbar, so put it at the top
-started grouping cards into categories, like said news would be a huge heading and news articles would be under it
-doesn't know why he put airport services at the top
-began placing remaining cards where he thinks they would go since he didn't know what they were for (mainly the ones with Bart on it)
-placed things he thought were important and what you would want the user to see first at the top of the page
-based the categories based off what was important, what user wants to see, what the owners want the user to see, etc
